adding, Ms. Olshansky?

MS. OLSHANSKY: No, Your Honor. I think we've addressed everything that people had for today. Thank you.

THE COURT: Thank you. Now, Mr. Henry.

MR. HENRY: Your Honor, before I address some specific points, I just wanted to point out, I mentioned with respect to the factual return filings, our count was 62 detainees as to the total.

THE COURT: That's what you said.

MR. HENRY: That was in error. It should be 63. I apologize to the Court for that. Your Honor, again, maybe going in reverse order here, with respect to Ms. Gutierrez's statements, the different set of accommodations that she's talking about arose from the fact that hers was the very first counsel visit and that at that time, you know, things were just getting started up as far as how these counsel access procedures would work.

THE COURT: Are you telling me that when she goes back again, assuming she will be going back again, and have one of her multiple visits, or at least a second visit, things will all have been ironed out and will be smooth?

MR. HENRY: I doubt that, Your Honor, but when she goes back, she will be subject to the same counsel access and mail and material exchange procedures that everyone else is.

There is --

THE COURT: No discrimination?

MR. HENRY: No discrimination. Everyone's treated the same. There is one subset of information that came up during her visit, and just because of some confusion, some representations that were made to her down there, that kind of thing, we agreed that there was an exception made for that little subset of materials. It was just because we couldn't feel like we could go back and essentially subject those materials to the procedures that we had in mind for everybody.

So that was kind of a special exception. It was not any sort of creation of special procedures for her case to continue on throughout her case or anything like that. We're trying to treat everybody the same.

And obviously, Judge Kollar-Kotelly's rulings in this matter will impact how things are done in the future. Along those lines, I'm not sure of the utility or necessity of an additional motion on essentially the exact same issues and us having to go through another round of briefing on it. Judge Kotelly presumably has those issues under advisement.

THE COURT: Well, certainly as to the last counsel,
Ms. Gutierrez is hopeful that you can work out your situation there. That might defer any motion that would have been filed in that regard. Now, perhaps not. We'll see. You don't look very optimistic, I must say.

MR. HENRY: That's right, Your Honor.
